

Abstract

In this dissertation I employ a case study methodology to explore the dynamics of shame in the therapeutic relationship. I elaborate my rationale for practice and investigate the psychotherapeutic literature regarding the varied manifestations of shame in the therapeutic dyad. The case study demonstrates my integration of these theoretical constructs into practice. It details how I worked together with a client towards healing her shame and the reciprocal healing of shame I received in the process.