

Abstract

This dissertation considers how attachment works within my Humanistic and Integrative practice. It looks at how an ambivalent attachment style in the psychotherapist can work with an ambivalently attached client.

I describe my rationale for practice and review the literature available on attachment theory. I will demonstrate through a case study the psychotherapist's role as a safe base within a reparative relationship.